"Water Views: Visions for the Lewiston Waterfront," features the design work of third year landscape architecture students at Washington State University.

Over the spring semester, students explored the links between people and place in the Lower Snake River Basin. For their final project, they created design visualizations for the Lewiston Waterfront.

The students' work was informed by site visits, research, interviews, conversations, observation, and reflection. All of their projects seek to foster opportunities for Lewiston to connect with the waterfront. Ultimately, the projects consider multiple understandings of the Snake River, offering new Water Views.
